Raymond Patriarca, Henry Tameleo of Cranston, R. I., his purported lieutenant in the New England Cosa Nostra, and Ronald Cassesso of Somerville, an alleged strong arm man, were found guilty of conspiracy to murder yesterday in the U. S. District Court at Boston.

U. S. Atty. Paul F. Markham, who prosecuted the trio, called it a "break-through in the pursuit of organized crime and gangland slayings in New England."

Said the 60-year-old Patriarca after his conviction:

"You are persecuting an old man."

Atty. Gen. Elliot Richardson called the conviction "a great advancement for law enforcement."

For Joseph (Barboza) Baron, who turned government witness, and said Patriarca hired him to kill a Providence gambler, the jury's verdict meant he has become a credible witness for future prosecutions of gangland killings and anti-crime operations at both the state and federal level.

More sensations in the latest drive against organized crime, including an explanation of the car bombing of Baron's lawyer, Atty. John E. Fitzgerald, Jr., in Everett in January, will be unfolded swiftly, investigators predicted last night.

The all-male federal court jury took about four hours — interrupted by two inquiries to Judge Francis J. W. Ford — to convict Patriarca, Tameleo, and Cassesso, 36.

The three face sentences of 5 to 15 years in a federal penitentiary when they reappear before Judge Ford on March 25.

Patriarca, the subject of the worst pardon scandal in the history of Massachusetts in the mid-'30s, was back in his home at 165 Lancaster St., Providence, last night, free on $25,000 bail.

TWO IN JAIL

But Cassesso and Tameleo were at the Norfolk Prison Colony and at the Charles Street Jail, respectively. Cassesso is serving a nine to 12-year sentence for armed robbery. Tameleo is held without bail in connection with a Suffolk County case.

Flushed with victory in his drive on organized crime within his jurisdiction, U.S. Atty. Markham gave high praise to the FBI, operatives of the office of Dist. Atty. Garrett H. Byrne of Suffolk County and Providence police who testified as government witnesses against Patriarca, long the boss of the gaming-ridden Federal Hill section of Providence.

Baron, last night, was back in his secret hideout with his 23-year-old wife, a situation that

What will be the next move in the 35-year-old Baron's "tell-all" role was not disclosed last night. But the wires between the U.S. Department of Justice at Washington and U.S. Atty. Markham's office were busy last night in the wake of the impetus given the offensive against organized crime in New England.

It was reported that Baron next will tell of the manner in which overlords of crime have taken over legitimate business enterprises in New England as a "cover" for their illicit operations.

NEXT CASE

Baron's comment last night was a terse "next case."

Prosecuting Patriarca and the other two with Markham were an attorney from the U.S. Department of Justice, Walter T. Barnes, as well as Asst. U.S. Atty. Edward F. Harrington of Markham's staff.

The defense counsel, Attys. Joseph J. Balliro for Tameleo; Ronald J. Chisholm for Cassesso and Charles J. Curran of Providence for Patriarca, immediately served notice they would appeal yesterday's conviction. From the start they have maintained that a fair trial was im-
